The Boy and the Rainbow.

"At the foot of the rainbow lies a pot of gold." Some rather unscrupulous wag has told Johnny Pays n so; and one afternoon, when a beautiful shower marched off to the east with a splendid rainbow on its back, like the gay sash of a militia of-fier across his shoulders, Johnny look sharp for the exact location of one foot of that bright "bow of promise," and saw precisealy where it rested-in the corner of his father's great garden. He snatched a hoe, and slipped around behind the shed, and ran for the charmed spot-without being observed, he fondly fancied; and on climbing the last wall that intercepted his vision, what was his disappointment to find that he was mistaken in the locality, that the foot of the rainbow was a quarter of a mile beyond, in a little valley in the pasture. "Never mind," thought Johnny, "I can run there directly, and it is not more than digging in the garden after all."

Boy-like he ran at full speed for the valley, scarcely looking at the object of his ing the golden valley, when, to his great grief, he saw that the glittering promise was away on the opposite hill. A tangled swamp lay in his path, but the rainbowgold lay beyond. Torn clothes torn feet, and bleeding hands were drawbacks to the enjoyment, to be sure, but a pot of gold so serve to purchase a much coveted ball and bat, upon which young Johnny had set his affections.

But the most serious drawback to the enjoyment was the final discovery, on emerging from the brambles, that the rain- I bow was "nowhere," and that the sum had left but a small legacy of light to the weeping earth, for the benefit of our Johnny in his homeward march over a long mile of swamp, and hill, and valley. His father and mother spared him that night, judging that meditation was the best sauce for such a dish as he had made for him-

In the morning his mother brought him his wet and torn clothes, nicely dried and mended, and, with a smile and a kiss, told him his father wished to see him.

For what could it be? Nething bad, surely; for his mother would not betray with a kiss. He hurried up, and went to his breakfast, with a look that inquired added to its capital makes it one of the Breakfast, over his father said, kindly: Insur-

Johnny looked down, and the rainbow began to shine in his face as well as his thoughts, for he blushed warmly. "And so you thought you would chase the rainbow last night—led off by Billy Wilson's joke. It was no use to slip behind the woodhouse; I saw you, and guessed your errand."

The rainbow grew all red in Johnny's face, but he was mute, and hardly peeped out from under his hat, to see what was coming next. "You saw the foot of the rainbow in the garden did you?" "Yes father," Johnny said, timidly, and looked up a little.

"Well, so did I," added Mr. Payson, Office, Paw Paw, Michigan. "and now get your boe and come with me and we'll dig there, and you shall have half the money." Johnny looked up full and fair, with a world of wonder and delight in his great eyes. "Why, father, I thought you would call it all nonsense; you said Billy was jok-"Ah! well, we'll see if there is no gold

Mr. Payson turned up the ground with a spade, and Johnny raked it all over, and by the direction of his father, was very careful to pick up every pubble and stick which might interfere with the charm that was to be wrought. They furrowed the land into little squares, like a checker-board

"Not digging gold to-day, my son, but getting ready. In the fall, when the carrots are grown, we'll dig there beautiful gold, and you shall have more money to purchase what you desire than if you were chasing rainbows all the year."
